

The gates at Mr. Dennis Washington's home at Hempton, near Banbury, kept opening and closing without anybody touching them. This might not seem so surprising, because Mr. Washington had paid £50 for a sonic device that opened the gates automatically when he pressed a button in his horse-drawn carriage, on which he is pictured. But even when he was nowhere near, the gates still swing to and fro all day, the sonic system being activated by the many jets passing overhead in that area. Now Mr. Washington is seeking a new device — with a different frequency.
